Chalco Lowers Aluminum Capacity Zacks (Oct 29, 2008)(227 words)

Full Text: COPYRIGHT 2008 COMTEX News Network, Inc.

Byline: Paul Raman, CFA

Oct 29, 2008 (Zacks Investment Research via COMTEX) -- Aluminum Corporation of China, Ltd. (ACH), or Chalco, is the third-largest alumina producer in the world by output. The company expects to benefit from the long-term growth of the Chinese economy as well as through capacity expansion, acquisitions, and joint ventures. Chalco is investing in its own mine production and is also diversifying its production base by expanding overseas. However, higher raw material and power costs forced the company to reduce its aluminum capacity by 1 million tons in 2008. Moreover, the company reported a 93% fall in its net profits in the third quarter of 2008. Higher raw material and power costs along with potential overcapacity force us to rate the shares a Hold with a target price of $7.00. Read the full analyst report on ACH

Miss Ten Harmsel also feels that Elizabeth's originality is emphasized by contrast with Jane Bennet, who is a heroine of the conventional stamp.

22. Compare Ten Harmsel, A Study in Fictional Conventions, pp. 90-91. Miss Ten Harmsel notes the similarity between Lady Catherine de Bourgh and Mrs. Delvile, but feels that there is a more marked similarity between Lady Catherine's encounter with Elizabeth Bennet and the scene in Pamela where Lady Davers abuses Pamela for having captivated Mr. B--.

23. Another view of the novel's origins and development is found in B. C. Southam's Jane Austen's Literary Manuscripts (Oxford University Press, 1964), pp. 59-62, where it is suggested that Pride and Prejudice was originally a satire, in epistolary form, on the theme of "first impressions" that was so prevalent in the literature of Jane Austen's day.

24. In the chapter on Pride and Prejudice in Marvin Mudrick's Irony as Defense and Discovery, Darcy's resemblance to conventional heroes in the latter part of the novel is interpreted as one of its failings.

25. The fact that the episodes in Grandison just mentioned had been imitated in the minor literature of the period strengthens my belief that Jane Austen's borrowings are purposeful. In Thomas Hull's The History of Sir William Harrington, for example, similar scenes occur when Lord C--'s bride reaches her new habitation. See Harrington (London, 1772), vol. 3, letter 52, pp. 1-7. Compare the suggestion of F. W. Bradbrook (Jane Austen and Her Predecessors, pp. 58-59) that the descriptions of Pemberley may have been influenced by passages in William Gilpin's Observations on the Mountains and Lakes of Cumberland and Westmorland.

26. Jane Austen, of course, uses the patrician hero elsewhere. Henry Tilney, wiser and wealthier than his heroine, and adored by her almost from the moment they meet, is a more nearly "straight" Burney-Richardson hero. In a later chapter it will be noted that Edmund Bertram, mentor and eventual lover of Fanny Price, receives a treatment somewhat similar to Darcy's.

Source Citation: Moler, Kenneth L. "Pride and Prejudice and the Patrician Hero." Jane Austen's Art of Allusion. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1968. 74-

The last few years have brought a great deal of talk about a "nuclear renaissance" and a new bipartisan consensus in favor of building more nuclear power plants. In the hope of striking a grand bargain on climate legislation during the last Congress, many environmentalists were willing to go along with what President Obama and others held up as a sensible compromise: federal subsidies for nuclear power and more leeway for offshore oil drilling in exchange for a carbon cap-and-trade system. But the BP oil spill helped to quash that idea, and the disaster in Japan should bury it. If we are ever going to get global-warming legislation--and with denialists in control of the House, that's not likely anytime soon--it will have to be some other way.

The idea of a nuclear renaissance was never a good one. Nuclear power is phenomenally more expensive than the alternatives, there is still no solution to the disposal of spent fuel, and as the Fukushima catastrophe illustrates, the potential costs of disaster are so staggering that no private investors will risk the full liability. And that's just the beginning of the case against going nuclear; the Center for American Progress has a useful list of "10 Reasons Not to Invest in Nuclear Energy," in which safety comes up only as reason No. 7.

But you don't have to take it from a liberal think tank. At the American Enterprise Institute in March, John Rowe, the CEO of Exelon--the energy company with the most nuclear reactors in the United States--said that nuclear power plants are becoming increasingly difficult to justify financially because the costs are far higher than natural gas, which "produces cheaper clean electricity" and will be abundant for decades.

The Healthy Fallout From Fukushima

by Paul Starr

The last few years have brought a great deal of talk about a “nuclear renaissance” and a new bipartisan consensus in favor of building more nuclear power plants. In the hope of striking a grand bargain on climate legislation during the last Congress, many environmentalists were willing to go along with what President Obama and others held up as a sensible compromise: federal subsidies for nuclear power and more leeway for offshore oil drilling in exchange for a carbon cap-and-trade system. But the BP oil spill helped to quash that idea, and the disaster in Japan should bury it. If we are ever going to get global-warming legislation—and with denialists in control of the House, that’s not likely anytime soon—it will have to be some other way.

The idea of a nuclear renaissance was never a good one. Nuclear power is phenomenally more expensive than the alternatives, there in the United States—said that nuclear power plants are becoming increasingly difficult to justify financially because the costs are far higher than natural gas, which “produces cheaper clean electricity” and will be abundant for decades.

The finance of nuclear plants may be one decision about energy that we would be better off leaving to the market because investors seem to be more rational about it than either the administration or congressional Republicans. In deciding whether to approve new nuclear power plants, building new reactors; it’s decommissioning old ones that have long outlived their projected lifespan. That’s where the fallout from Fukushima may have its most salutary effect: new attention to the potential hazards of aging nuclear plants like the one at Indian Point on the Hudson River in New York. The Fukushima Daiichi station is about 140 miles from Tokyo, but Indian renewables. Crossing that bridge as expeditiously as possible ought to be the focus of policy. Nuclear energy is a mature technology; far from getting cheaper, its costs have steadily escalated. Public investment should develop the technologies that are moving in the other direction with real promise of becoming dramatically less expensive and more efficient.

There will be inconveniences along the way, and many people will not want to make the adjustments in everyday life that a sustainable world demands. If there is one consistent theme in
